

The church and spiritual gifts

Why does Paul compare the church to a body?

Paul uses the body to show how people with different gifts belong to one another in Christ. Gifts exist for the community's good, and love determines whether their use serves the Lord whom the church confesses.

Every member belongs

In 1 Corinthians 12, the body cannot function if every member claims the same role, and visible members cannot dismiss quieter ones. Paul directly challenges both inferiority and superiority. The Spirit joins people across ethnic and social divisions. This makes church life more than attending a religious performance: members owe attention, honor, and practical care to people whose needs and abilities differ from their own.

Gifts are entrusted for service

Paul's lists include speaking, teaching, helping, leadership, and other manifestations of the Spirit. Their variety discourages a single ladder on which everyone competes for the most impressive ability. The relevant question is how a gift benefits others. Romans 12 links the exercise of gifts with humility and faithful participation. A position of responsibility never exempts its holder from moral accountability or the need to receive help.

Love governs public worship

First Corinthians 13 stands between chapters about spiritual gifts. Its description of love therefore addresses the life of a divided congregation, not only wedding ceremonies. Chapter 14 then emphasizes intelligibility and building up the church. In practice, a speaker's enthusiasm is insufficient if listeners cannot understand. Clear explanations, interpretation where needed, orderly participation, and attention to visitors belong within spiritually serious worship.

Respect differences without abandoning discernment

Continuationist Christians expect gifts such as prophecy and tongues to continue; cessationist Christians understand some gifts as especially associated with the apostolic foundation. Neither label alone establishes the quality of a church's love or faithfulness. Readers should examine the arguments and distinguish extraordinary claims from verified events. Paul's demand for testing, order, and mutual benefit prevents spiritual language from becoming a shield against reasonable questions.
